It is not probable that the conspirators against the President will trouble themselves about the "two-thirds vote" necessary to consict. The House of Representatives has the "sole power of impeachment." A bare majority of that body may prefer articles of impeachment. The trial must take place before the Senate, the Chief Justice presiding, and two thirds of the members present must concur to secure a conviction. Suppose the House takes the initiatory steps, what follows? The President is then under arrest and must step saide and give place to the President of the Senate until he is tried. Impeachments are of slow progreen. As there would be no chance really to convict, it would be the policy of the radicals to delay the trial to the last moment, and Chief Justice Chase is just the man to accommodate them bring the test oath case to a conclusion, we see the temper of the man. He would postpone the trial of the imfor which Mr Johnson is elected, exwould result in a revolution North overwhelming to the radicals, but would give them the power during the present Congress to pass whatever laws they might wish. More than this they could not expect. If President Johnson were to yield to them now, and permit them to carry out their plans, the people in the next Congressional election would condomn them.

Upon the question of repealing or declaring the secession ordinance of 1881 null and void, there was considerable difference of opinion, and much debate. Many believed that the ordinance was valid, others that it was a usurpation and void from the beginning; others that it was revolutionary and that nonsecession made it obligatory on the people to amend it. The discussion of the question, however, resulted in the following ordinance on which the Convention harmonized: As ordinance declaring the ordinance of seconds
